Samsung Galaxy Tab Hits UK Streets

The crowded tablet market just got a bit more busy, as Samsung's Galaxy Tab went on sale in the UK.

Unveiled on 2 September at the IFA 2010 consumer electronics show in Berlin, Samsung's long-anticipated Galaxy Tab features a TFT-LCD 7-inch screen and a Cortex A8 1GHz processor, paired with Google's Android 2.2 operating system. It comes with 16GB of internal memory as standard, scalable to 32GB of external memory, as well as Wi-Fi and 3G connectivity.

Unlike the Apple iPad, its main competitor, the Galaxy Tab offers a camera and the ability to act as a phone should you wish. And of course, it supports Flash.

Google is gaining on the booming smartphone market

Google's Android mobile operating system continues to gain favour with users, helping it rise to the number two spot worldwide, according to research firm Canalys.

Nokia's Symbian continued to lead the market with a 37 per cent share, while Android had 17 per cent of the market. It has surpassed Research In Motion, Apple and Microsoft this year.

Growing popularity of Android phones - made by companies including Motorola, HTC and Samsung - puts Google in a good position as handsets look set to surpass computers for browsing the web.

Twitter Set To Pass 200 Million Users

Twitter is adding 370,000 new users each day and is expected to near 200 million users worldwide by the end of the year

Twitter is undergoing some management changes as the micro blogging service races towards 200 million users.

If it continues adding new users at a rate of 370,000 a day, Twitter could nearly pass 200 million users by the end of 2010.

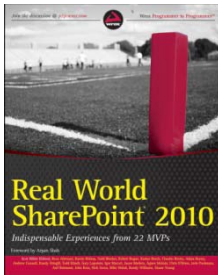

That calculation comes courtesy of an 30 October article in The New York Times, which pegged Twitter's current user base at 175 million.

With 60 days left in 2010, that puts Twitter on track to reach 197.5 million users by the end of the year - or even pass the 200 million mark, given the natural fluctuations in people joining and leaving.
